Sea of sugarcane swirls around a batey (left), the barrackslike village of harvesters and their families. The Republic must admit some 12,000 Haitians annually for the harvest, largely because its own citizens consider cane cutting underpaid and demeaning. For a backbreaking day's work, this Haitian cutter (below) may earn $4.50.

The Western Hemisphere's oldest city

CAPITAL OF ADVENTURE, Santo Domingo sprawls beside the meandering Ozama River, where Columbus's brother, Bartolomé, founded the city in 1496 as seat of Spain's first New World colony. Pirates and swashbucklers coveted Santo Domingo for its gold. The English buccaneer Sir Francis Drake seized the city in 1586. His price for leaving: 25,000 gold ducats.

In the old colonial city stand scores of restored structures, including the Ozama

Dizzying growth of Santo Domingo—it has quintupled in population since 1950—reflects a massive influx of rural poor.

Clouds veil the beauty of the Dominican Republic's rugged heartland, where parallel mountain ranges wall lush valleys that shelter fruitful farmlands.
